WELCOME

I am delighted to welcome you to Indies & Idols.

Featuring the orchestral music of some of indie-rock's most celebrated luminaries – Radiohead's Jonny Greenwood, The National's Bryce Dessner and singer-songwriter Sufjan Stevens – alongside the classical sources of their inspiration, this concert exemplifies why the ACO is acclaimed around the world for its bold, inspired and stimulating approach to programming and performance.

Of these composers, Richard Tognetti and the Orchestra have forged a particularly close connection with Jonny Greenwood. Jonny was the ACO's first ever composer-in-residence in 2012, where he spent three months immersed in rehearsals and concerts. The result was the sublimely hypnotic work Water, which we released on vinyl in 2017.

Following this national tour, the Orchestra will reunite with one of Australia's great artists, the acclaimed photographer Bill Henson, for a reimagination of our musical and visual feast, Luminous, to be performed in concert halls around the country in August.

It is thanks to you that we are able to tour these concerts, as well as our education programs, across Australia each year. The ACO earns 90% of its own revenue, and ticket sales only make up 40% of what it takes to bring our work to stages and classrooms around the country.

Donations from the public are vital to our existence. I encourage you to consider making a tax-deductible donation to the ACO before 30 June.

Thank you for joining us in the concert hall and I hope you enjoy the performance.

Witold Lutosławski

Overture for Strings

Witold Lutosławski composed his Overture for Strings in 1947, dedicating it to Mirko Očadlik, director of the Prague Radio Symphony Orchestra, which premiered the work in 1949. Originally titled “Intermezzo”, it is Lutosławski’s first attempt at creating a new sound language. It grows out of the tradition of Bartók’s Divertimento and Stravinsky’s Concerto in D, and foreshadows Lutosławski’s Musique Funèbre of 1958, the first work the composer recognised as representing his true musical voice. The Overture, which is composed in sonata allegro form with two contrasting themes, contains the building blocks for the composer’s characteristic “chain” technique, in which different strands of music overlap and gradually exchange material.

Bryce Dessner

Réponse Lutosławski

Réponse Lutosławski was written as a homage to Witold Lutosławski’s seminal composition Musique Funèbre. Dessner, who is best known as a member of rock band The National, spent months studying the work, as well as numerous others by the composer. He describes this period of immersion as “an amazing process of discovering one of the 20th-century’s great musical minds and allowing his adventurous spirit to influence my own musical decisions.” His Réponse Lutosławski is written in five movements, each of which is inspired either directly or indirectly by Lutosławski’s score. Dessner writes: “I like to think that his music opened a window in a certain direction for me, or pushed open a door, through which I could then pass and take my journey with the music.”

Sufjan Stevens

Suite from Run Rabbit Run

Arranged for string orchestra by
Michael Atkinson

Sufjan Stevens’ 2001 album Enjoy Your Rabbit has become the source of inspiration for numerous arrangements and collaborations, including the album Run Rabbit Run, which contains string quartet arrangements by such composers as Michael Atkinson, Rob Moose, Nico Muhly and Gabriel Kahane. It was this album that caught the attention of choreographer Justin Peck, who commissioned a new orchestration by Michael Atkinson for New York City Ballet’s 2012 production of Year of the Rabbit. Sufjan Stevens describes Michael Atkinson’s four-movement suite as “to my ears, more alive, more capable, more full realised than their original recordings. I was constructing Frankenstein’s monster ... what is revealed is a full-grown man ... It’s alive!”

Krzysztof Penderecki

Three Pieces in Baroque Style: I. Aria

Penderecki's Three Pieces in Baroque Style were originally composed as film music for Wojciech Has's 1964 film The Saragossa Manuscript. In the film, two army officers from opposite sides of the Napoleonic Wars discover a manuscript that tells the story of one officer's grandfather, many years before. Renowned for his heavily avant-garde compositions, Three Pieces in Baroque Style present Penderecki as a skilful stylist and imitator, who creates a pastiche of early music that includes a wistful baroque Aria and two Minuets in the rococo style.

String Quartet No.1

Penderecki's String Quartet No.1 of 1960 consists not of melodies, harmonies or even conventional rhythms, but of a wide range of sounds and colours produced by unconventional string techniques that are rendered on paper as scattered, almost graphic notation (similar to his famous Threnody to the Victims of Hiroshima). Although Penderecki had already found success in Europe, this short but thoroughly engrossing quartet helped to make him an international success. It was his first work to receive its world premiere in the United States, and along with other works of his, the quartet was selected to appear in the score for the 1973 film The Exorcist, for which it was highly praised.

Jonny Greenwood

Suite from There Will Be Blood

Famous as the lead guitarist of the iconic band Radiohead, Jonny Greenwood is also a leading composer of film music, notably for the films of Paul Thomas Anderson. The 2007 film There will be Blood, starring Daniel Day-Lewis, relies heavily on Greenwood's underscore to set mood and atmosphere, and to propel the drama in a film about relentless ambition in the oil fields of early-20th-century California. Greenwood's desolate, menacing score is influenced by his experiences with 20th-century classical music, notably Messiaen, Ligeti and Penderecki. "I tried to write to the scenery, and the story rather than specific 'themes' for characters. It's not really the kind of narrative that would suit that. It was all about the underlying menace in the film."

Karol Szymanowski

(1882–1937)

String Quartet No.2, Op.56

Richard Tognetti

Szymanowski’s String Quartet No.2 was composed in 1927, the year following the premiere of his great opera King Roger, and a time when he was re-discovering his appreciation for Polish folk music. The quartet makes use of Polish folk idioms without quoting actual folk melodies, and sees the composer expanding traditional classical forms. The first movement is a modified sonata form; the second movement is a loose rondo with its melody and rhythm inspired by Gorale folk music; the third movement is a four-part double fugue with folk-derived themes. Composed in a period of neo-classicism, Szymanowski’s quartet seamlessly fuses together the classical tradition with a neo-romantic, even expressionistic, sound world, such that the quartet remains one of Richard Tognetti’s favourite works.

A LESS INHERI

ON IN TANCE

“Indies & Idols is a program about musical inheritance, inheritance over time and across boundaries that may be more porous than they first appear”

“This program does not look friendly on paper,” laughs Anna Melville, Artistic Administrator of the Australian Chamber Orchestra. Cast your eye down the running order and you’ll find “a lot of names”: consonant-heavy Polish names that carry with them the faint threat of atonality and avant-gardism, and other names that may look familiar but are possibly, in this context, out of place.

Melville says “this is one of those programs that’s greater than the sum of its parts. It’s really about how it’s all going to work together.” And that, Artistic Director Richard Tognetti says, is “the idea – this was really the genesis of the program, not any particular piece – of bringing a generation of contemporary composers together with their influences”. Indies & Idols is a program about musical inheritance, inheritance over time and across boundaries that may be more porous than they first appear. Some of those boundaries are between the “classical” and “popular”, for instance, a boundary that Jonny Greenwood of Radiohead thinks has “been blurred for decades”.

Musical inheritance can manifest in all sorts of ways: overtly or subtly; predictably or bizarrely; steadily, over the course of generations, or seeming to erupt up out of nowhere. Tognetti thinks that the contemporary composers of Indies & Idols – Greenwood, Sufjan Stevens and Bryce Dessner – are the inheritors of what has been a “slow-motion response” to the upheavals of Modernism. “This generation that I’m part of, and younger, have all responded to Modernism in a sort of slow dance, if you like,” he says. “It’s taken a long time.” The protracted absorption of Modernist innovation has happened, Tognetti observes, because “people are really cynical and suspicious and sceptical of anything new. They always have been.” But it’s also because the changes wrought by musical Modernism – fundamental alterations of tonality and rhythm; a rigorous questioning of what counted as music at all – were, in turn, responses to a time of unprecedented change.

Take the life of Karol Szymanowski, “one of the great Modernist composers”, in Tognetti’s words, whose String Quartet No.2, Op.56 anchors this program. Szymanowski was born in 1882, into a wealthy family whose landed estates were to be found in the Polish village of Tymoszkówka, which was a part of the vast Russian Empire. That village is now Tymoshivka, in central Ukraine. The altered name and shifting national status of Szymanowski’s birthplace is evidence of decades – almost a whole century – of turmoil and innovation, some of it incredible, much of it terrible beyond words.

Cars, aeroplanes, widespread electric lighting, radio, phonographic recording, telephones, cinema: all these things came to be during Szymanowski’s lifetime. He and his peers lived through the First World War, the Russian Revolution and the dissolution of empires – Russian, Ottoman, Austro-Hungarian – that had existed for centuries. Lameness prevented Szymanowski from military service during the First World War, and so, unlike countless other men, his life was not ended in the trenches. By the time Szymanowski composed his second string quartet in 1927, the sheltered world of European gentry into which he had been born was gone, never to return. By the time of his death in 1937, from tuberculosis, another world war was edging closer.

Then there was music. Szymanowski “sits in an interesting place,” says Tognetti. “He’s a Neo-Romanticist at the same time as being a Modernist.” Szymanowski drew upon a wide range of influences, from the deeply felt Romantic lyricism of his Polish countryman Chopin (Szymanowski, too, was a pianist) to the shimmering tonal innovations of Debussy and the driving rhythms of Stravinsky. He also wove the melodies of Polish folk music – particularly the music of the Goral people, of the Tatra Mountains – into his work. Fellow composer Michał Kondracki, a generation younger than Szymanowski, once recalled overhearing his friend “at his old, trusty piano, working on the second Quartet ... He would repeat one musical phrase a number of times, looking, perhaps, for the appropriate shape or harmonic background for it. It was a reminiscence of some Highland melody ...”

Top. Karol Szymanowski.
47 Street, Warsaw, where Szymanowski lived and composed in 1924–29.

A passion for folk music was not unique to Szymanowski. Before him, Chopin had worked to bring the waltzes and mazurkas of Polish folk tradition to the salons of 19th-century Europe. In his brilliant survey The Rest Is Noise: Listening to the Twentieth Century, music critic Alex Ross places Szymanowski among those of the composer’s peers, such as the English composer Ralph Vaughan Williams, or the Finnish Jean Sibelius, who attempted to forge various “national” – though not necessarily nationalistic – music out of the folk traditions of their home countries. Tognetti adds the Hungarian Béla Bartók, and “our very own Percy Grainger”, to this list of Modernist folk enthusiasts, while also pointing out that Szymanowski listened, and travelled, beyond the borders of Poland, visiting France, England, Italy and North Africa for inspiration. “The popular music that was from the Ottomans,” Tognetti says, “let’s not forget, was a very, very important part of his [compositional] language.”

That synthesis of music – Polish, Byzantine, Romantic, Modern – can best be heard in Szymanowski’s celebrated opera, King Roger (Król Roger), which took him six years of painstaking work, from 1918 to 1924, to complete. But one can also hear it in String Quartet No.2, particularly the second movement, “Vivace scherzando”, in which melodic phrases from Polish folk song are snatched up and then shattered, only to be put back together at a hectic pace. The quartet is a personal favourite of Tognetti’s, and one he has previously performed, recorded, and toured internationally. It is presented in this program in Tognetti’s own arrangement for string orchestra. “People sometimes think that arranging a piece means rewriting it – it doesn't mean that at all," he says. Instead, this arrangement of Szymanowski's quartet underlines its existing dynamism, its roving musical intelligence.

"All the Polish repertoire on the program is really folk driven," Melville says, which may come as a surprise to anyone who more readily associates Krzysztof Penderecki, for one, with the disquieting compositions that made his reputation in the early 1960s, among them Threnody to the Victims of Hiroshima (1960) and Polymorphia (1961). This was music made from dense and swarming microtonal clusters; "it captured the horror of the 20th century," says Tognetti, which is one reason listeners remain drawn to it. Witold Lutosławski, too, while he lived, drew deeply upon Modernism, working with 12-tone rows in his Musique funébre (1958) and aleatoric, or chance, techniques in Jeux vénitiens (1961). And yet both of these composers turned at different points in their careers – Lutosławski early on, Penderecki well after his name had been established – towards the melodic clarity of folk music.

This breadth of influence among Poland's leading musical Modernists has a parallel, Tognetti thinks, with the work of contemporary composers such as Greenwood, Dessner and Stevens, who are now creating an even newer sound in the concert hall. "After two or more generations, we now find musicians who accept Modernism as more than just a trope," he says. "And they're responding to it. I mean, look at Bryce's piece: it's a response to Lutosławski. Jonny's music is a response to the music of Penderecki." Combining their interest in Modernism with their experience in the world of popular music, these composers, Tognetti remarks, "have been liberated in their own art form of the rock, indie world, and they've also grown up as serious, art music connoisseurs. Now they're finally in a position where they have the craft and education" – not least in formal notation, a historically uncommon skill among popular musicians – "to express themselves in the world of so-called fine art music".

Of the three contemporary composers whose work is included in this program, it is Jonny Greenwood who has the most well-established relationship with the ACO. His work has featured in the Orchestra's concert repertoire several times, and in 2012 he undertook a three-month appointment as the ensemble's composer-in-residence, during which time he wrote Water, a "hypnotic piece", in Tognetti's words, for flute, upright piano, chamber organ, tanpura and string orchestra.

"I was so lucky to write for them," Greenwood reflects, "and to hear them perform and practice. Such a privilege. They have this intensity and energy – like an insane mixture of enthusiasm and certainty – which makes for the most overwhelming performances." Tognetti is equally complimentary, enthusing about Greenwood's 2011 homage to Penderecki, 48 Responses to Polymorphia, which he calls "a brilliant work".

"Violins are so glorious," Greenwood says, when asked about his facility for strings, the unusual, dramatic arrangements he writes for Radiohead, and his own compositions for film and orchestra. He learned to play the viola as a teenager and was a member of the Thames Vale Youth Orchestra. "I was once taught that all instruments aim to replicate the human voice – to sing. With string instruments, I think they surpass the human voice. Or put another way, I listen to lots of classical singers, and wish they had the warmth, agility and beauty of, say, a cello."

Though he is best known as a flamboyant electric guitarist – and an indefatigable multi-instrumentalist – Greenwood's lengthy engagement with classical music is well documented. He was a teenager in Oxford during the 1980s when he first heard Olivier Messiaen's 1949 Turangalila Symphonie, and, as he told the aforementioned Alex Ross in a 2001 New Yorker profile of Radiohead, "I became round-the-bend obsessed with it". So much so that he would eventually teach himself how to play the ondes Martenot, a rare and early electronic instrument that featured in Messiaen's work and which can be heard, in all its wailing weirdness, on several recordings by Radiohead, including "How to Disappear Completely" (2000), a song Tognetti singles out for the vertiginous beauty of its string arrangement.

Greenwood also had a formative encounter with the music of Penderecki, which he was introduced to during his brief tenure as a tertiary-level music student. He quit his degree in a matter of weeks after Radiohead signed a recording contract with EMI, but "in those few weeks

“I didn’t know you were allowed to be that free, and you could just think of these 48 musicians as being able to do anything. Suddenly all these possibilities opened up.”

I was lucky enough to be shown a Penderecki score, and played Polymorphia, by a tutor,” he recalled. “I didn’t know you were allowed to be that free, and you could just think of these 48 musicians as being able to do anything. Suddenly all these possibilities opened up.”

It is this liberation from the orthodoxies of both popular and classical music that Greenwood has brought to his career in composition, which is already extensive, encompassing eight film scores and nearly a dozen concert works. Suite from There Will Be Blood is arranged by the composer from his score to Paul Thomas Anderson’s 2007 film There Will Be Blood, a dark drama of the American West starring Daniel Day-Lewis as oil prospector Daniel Plainview. If, as Tognetti says, it has been the achievement of composers such as Penderecki to express the violence of the 20th century through sound, then it is no surprise that Greenwood’s score bears Penderecki’s influence, giving voice as it does to the rise and fall of a ruthless fuel baron at that century’s dawn.

There Will Be Blood was Greenwood’s first film score for Anderson; he has since scored an additional three films for the director, including last year’s widely acclaimed Phantom Thread. Suite from There Will Be Blood is striking in its range of mood and textures: descending glissando lines that sound, in their sinisterness, like the musical equivalent of Salvador Dali’s melting clocks; tense and bristling pizzicato sections; yearning moments of melody. It was written, Greenwood says, “mostly to stills of the landscape and the script. There were a few scenes to go on, too. The sweeter music was all written about H.W. – Daniel’s child in the film – and the bigger, darker music was all meant to be for the landscape. And one cue was, essentially, Jaws – Daniel as voracious oilman buying up all the land.” Listen and you can hear it: John Williams’ famous two-note shark theme transposed into the opening moments of Greenwood’s Suite, fit for another kind of carnage.

Anna Melville, too, notes the correspondence between the Polish composers on this program who challenged – and, in Penderecki’s case, continue to challenge – the structures of the academy and “this next generation of composers, who have access to people and influences outside the traditional conservatoire world.” Greenwood, she says, with his range of influences, “isn’t separate as a composer from who he is as a musician in Radiohead”.

The man himself would – to some degree – seem to concur, amenable to the suggestion that his work in composition, which is characterised by a lively tension between individual melodic lines and the ensemble en masse, has been influenced by his time as a member of a band. “I like the complexity of all the individual voices, and any element of controlled chaos that ensures no two performances - or even two bars - can sound the same,” he says. “Unison playing makes me think of keyboard presets. I guess maybe this does come from the mentality of playing in a band. Or perhaps because in the first Radiohead string section we could only afford one cello and one violin – and it’s been a long wait to get access to a whole room of players.”

For Bryce Dessner, things were rather the other way around. “My background in music is classical,” he told Salon in 2013. “I did graduate school in music.” Dessner studied at Yale School of Music, after an adolescence spent studying classical guitar. But becoming a composer was not an altogether straightforward path. A band called The National, which formed in the late 1990s just as Dessner was finishing music school, and in which he plays guitar, has ended up occupying a good amount of his time. Drawing upon a range of indie and art rock influences, from Joy Division to The Strokes, The National have released eight studio albums, their most recent just this year; their 2017 album Sleep Well Beast won them a Grammy for Best Alternative Music.

The National has also delved into more outré musical activities, including a 2013 collaboration with visual artist Ragnar Kjartansson, which saw them perform their song “Sorrow” at New York’s MoMA PS1 gallery for six hours straight. “Watching them, as different members take centre stage, stand back for another’s solo or pick up the slack while someone takes a break is marvelous,” The New York Times’ chief art critic, Roberta Smith, wrote in a review of Kjartansson’s resulting video installation.

Dessner never felt he had to choose between popular and classical music. “I’ve always been in rock bands,” he told Salon. “I was in a rock band with my brother in high school. Then I was playing classical guitar recitals, and people said, ‘You know, you can’t really do both things.’ My intuition told me they were wrong.” Speaking last year, Dessner observed that “the Stravinskys and Debussys of the world, they also had so much information in their music – it’s not just Western classical music informing them but folk music, Spanish music, music from the East”.

Réponse Lutosławski, which is receiving its Australian premiere on this program, is Dessner’s answer to Lutosławski’s Musique funébre. Co-commissioned by the National Audiovisual Institute of Poland and the Mexico National Orchestra, and first performed by the Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra in 2014, the work pays tribute to a composer who, Dessner says, “opened a window in a certain direction for me, or pushed open a door, through which I could then pass”.

Witold Lutosławski, born in 1913, represents the generation of Polish composers who came between Szymanowski and Penderecki, the latter born in 1933. Szymanowski was an early influence on Lutosławski, and the younger composer’s early work, written in the 1930s and ’40s, carried the imprint of Polish folk music. Like Szymanowski before him, Lutosławski was born into the Polish upper class, but his father, Józef, was also active in the Polish independence movement that aimed to liberate Poland from Tsarist Russia. Following the Russian Revolution, Józef’s political organising brought him into conflict with the Bolsheviks; he and his older son, Marian, were imprisoned and then executed in 1918. Witold Lutosławski was just five years old.

Lutosławski lived most of his life amid political conflict. As a young composer he earned a living playing piano in Polish bars during the Nazi occupation of Poland, risking his safety by playing Polish music – which had been banned – and Resistance songs. Many of the draft scores of his early compositions, including sketches for his first symphony, were lost when he fled Warsaw in 1944, shortly before the Warsaw Uprising. But the Russian powers that eventually seized Poland in the wake of the Nazi occupation provided little relief to Lutosławski; Symphony No.1, which was completed in 1947, was condemned under the strictures of Stalinism for being “Formalist”.

Overture for Strings, first performed in 1949, represents an early attempt by Lutosławski to compose using melodic “cells” – short, recurring note patterns in which one can still hear, at this point, the sprightly trace of Polish folk music. According to Polish musicologist Andrzej Chłopecki, the overture “heralds, in many ways, the things that will happen with Lutosławski’s music after Musique Funèbre”. These included his experiments in aleatoric composition – a path that Lutosławski was prompted to explore thanks to his reading of John Cage.

Dessner, too, has been shaped as a composer by the innovations of Minimalism, and like Lutosławski before him he is interested in that space where strict repetition meets indeterminacy: the score of Réponse Lutosławski begins with the instruction “Slightly out of time”.

Written in five movements, each section of Réponse Lutosławski is, Dessner says, “inspired either directly or indirectly” by Lutosławski’s score for Musique Funèbre. The first movement, “Resonance”, opens softly but arrestingly, with col legno passages in alternating duplet and triplet time on the cellos, and undulating, tremolo melodies on the violins, played high in the treble register. Triplet passages emerge again in the work’s third movement, “Des Traces”, which also has the cellists and contrabassists striking the sides of their instruments for percussive effect. But the overall effect of Réponse Lutosławski is ruminative, not aggressive; by the end of its closing section, “Residue”, Dessner’s piece has achieved a mood of poignant, fragile repose.

Like Greenwood, Dessner has also composed for film. He worked with Ryuichi Sakamoto and Alvo Noto on the score for Alejandro González Iñárritu's 2015 feature The Revenant – another drama of American frontier violence. Dessner has also worked with the third contemporary composer on this program, Sufjan Stevens, on an album called Planetarium (2017), a suite of songs about the solar system.

For her part, Melville is particularly looking forward to hearing Stevens' work Suite from Run Rabbit Run being played in front of an audience. Arranged for strings by Michael Atkinson, from Stevens' 2001 electronic album Enjoy Your Rabbit, the piece "is just such a party", Melville says. "It's one of those pieces that takes you by surprise: it's uplifting, moving, and gets people moving in a way that you weren't expecting. I love watching the audience in some of these moments, rather than the musicians."

Tognetti concurs. "Suite from Run Rabbit Run, we've now played a lot," he says, "and it's really high energy, the audience responds in a rapturous way, which is according to the energy of the music."

Both of them also agree on the fact that the live concert is an unsurpassable way to experience all of these works: attentively, and collectively, without the distraction of being able to click through to something else. "Being forced to listen is a wonderful thing," Tognetti says. "You don't just listen to 30 seconds and say, 'I don't like it.'"

Greenwood, too, who has played in countless settings and to millions of people for more than 30 years, is a passionate advocate of the live experience.

"If you've not seen a piece live, you've not heard it, and can't make a judgement," he says. "Penderecki, for example, is, on recordings, harsh, loud, abrasive, all the cliched things contemporary music is meant to be. In the concert hall, it's softer, stranger and far more colourful than the sound coming out of your speakers.

"All these players put so many years of their life into learning to play," he continues, "and that's all distilled into one performance ... and then their sound is just diffused into the room and soaked into the walls. If you aren't in that room, you can't experience the same feeling. That's the sensation I'm constantly chasing." ●

Spotlight on

YOUNG HENRYS

We caught up for a beer with Oscar McMahon, co-founder of Young Henrys, and asked him a few questions.

Why did Young Henrys become involved with the ACO?

We're avid supporters of the arts at Young Henrys, and the ACO clocks up around 100 gigs a year. They are a coal-faced cornerstone of the music scene in Australia. They bring classical arrangements to all of Australia, inspiring as many people as possible – which we think is awesome and important.

What drives your passion for supporting live music on the local and national stage?

Maintaining a vibrant live music scene is something we hold dear to our hearts. From our brewers, to the bar staff and office nerds, Young Henrys is littered with musicians, and we've always looked to support the pubs, clubs, hotels and venues that allow live music to thrive.

What drove the recent expansion of Young Henrys from a brewery to distillery?

A love of gin and sodas, (and taking note of our gradually expanding waistlines), helped give birth to Young Henrys Noble Cut Gin. Creator and Newtown native Josh Mitchell uses techniques and flavours from both brewing and distillation, as well as locally sourced Australian botanicals to create this unique New World Gin.

You recently celebrated your seventh birthday, congratulations! What's been the highlight so far and what do you have planned for the year ahead?

From presenting the Young Henrys Small World Festival to making a beer with the Foo Fighters, it's been an exciting few years of collaboration with people from near and far. Looking ahead, we'll focus on existing relationships, and some interesting cultural festivals and projects. Now more than ever in Australia we need to see more companies supporting and promoting culture, art and music.
